Research Project

• A study was carried on the Role of Anticardiolipin antibody in recurrent miscarriages of pregnant women. Antiphospholipid antibody syndrome (APS), one of the most common acquired thrombophilic disorders is a major cause for cerebrovascular accidents or stokes, myocardial infarction, venous thromboembolism and recurrent abortions/pregnancy losses especially in young patients. A study was conducted at Government Medical College, which is a tertiary care referral hospital. All patients who presented to the medicine department with APS during a two-year period were studied. A patient was considered to be positive for anticardiolipin (aCL) antibody or anti-β2 glycoprotein (anti-β2G) if the titer was more than 15 IU/mL, and a high titer was considered to be more than 40 IU/mL for Immunoglobulin (Ig) IgG and IgM isotypes. The fasting lipid profile was measured in all patients, and lipid profile abnormalities were defined with cutoffs of low-density lipoprotein (LDL) levels of >150 mg/dL, triglyceride (TG) levels of >150 mg/dL, and high-density lipoprotein (HDL) levels of <40 mg/dL. The relationship between lipid abnormalities and individual tests for APS, aCL IgG and IgM and anti-β2G IgG and IgM, were determined by statistical analysis. This study high-lightened the importance of testing lipid profile abnormalities in APS patients and the existence of a statistically significant relationship between antiphospholipid antibody tests and lipid profile abnormalities.
